The agrarian question in Russia is of tremendous importance at the present time. It is common knowledge that this question has been given front-rank prominence, not only by the broad masses of the people, but also by the government. Historically, the movement of 1905 was characterised precisely by the fact that the vast majority of the the matter here wasn't really economic. What really preoccupied the classical Marxist thinkers was a political question: would the peasants act as allies in the struggle to achieve socialism, or were they ultimately a reactionary, counter-revolutionary element?
