France. A Bresse house (French: Ferme bressane) is a type of farmhouse found in the Bresse region that is characterized by its long length, brick walls and wooden roof. A Mas is a traditional farmhouse unique to Provence and Southern France.

Farmhouse - Wikipedia

The house is what the French call a longère – literally a long building and almost always of a rural nature such as a farmhouse as this one is. One end of the house is clearly very old with what we call wattle and daub walls – otherwise known as hay and mud (torchis in French), some of the beams are huge and quite beautiful (to me).

Well, I think French Country is most definitely still a look and it tends to be even more ornate than French Farmhouse. I think French Farmhouse has been a combination of that Traditional French Country feel combined with the casualness of Farmhouse style. I guess the best way to totally cover the look is to show you.

French Farmhouse - Seeking Lavender Lane

A French farmhouse plays upon the contrast of dramatic details like carefully crafted dining room tables or exquisite chandeliers against a rustic farmhouse setting. When you walk into a home with French farmhouse style, you're transported to the fragrant lavender fields of Provence, and you're invited into an understated old-world paradise.

Because French farmhouse style is relatively void of color, the burden of visual interest comes to rest heavily on texture. This bedroom does not disappoint! Notice the rough-hewn bench at the foot of the bed, the bedside table baskets, the linen-covered chandelier. Of course, although the textures are earthy and organic, the details of the ...

A Closer Look at Farmhouse French Style

French farmhouse kitchens is a look that I've always gravitated to. It's a little more rustic in style. It's a little more rustic in style. Rather than just echoing "French Country" like mine and many other kitchens do, these either are actual farmhouse kitchens or look like they could be right in the middle of Provence.
